

Editing the website

Everything on this site that changes often is now yours to change: articles, market reports, the legal pages, and how people reach you. No developer, no plugins.

Three things to know first

Publish means published

There is no practice copy of the site. When you press Publish, the change is on the live website within about half a minute. If you publish something by accident, fix it and publish again; the correction travels just as fast.

Your work is saved as you type

Everything you write is kept as a draft automatically. You can close the tab mid-article and pick it up next week. Nothing reaches the website until you press Publish.

Alt text is not optional

Every image asks for a short description of what it shows. This is what a blind reader hears and what Google reads. The studio will not let you publish without it, on purpose.

Writing a new article

1 Create it

1. Sign in and choose Blog post in the left-hand list.
2. Press the + (new document) button above the list.
3. Fill in the fields below. The order on screen is the order to work through.

2 Fill in the details

FIELD	WHAT TO PUT
Title	The headline, as it should read on the page.
URL slug	Press Generate and it makes one from the title. Fix it now if it looks wrong; see the warning below.
Language	English, unless you are writing a German translation.
Publication date	The date shown on the article.
Category	Pick from the list. It shows above the headline.
Excerpt	One or two sentences. Appears on the blog index, on the home page, and as the description in Google results. Worth writing properly.
Cover image	Upload, then write the alt text. Add a photo credit if the image is not yours.
Author	Pre-filled with your name.
Reading time	Optional, in minutes. Shown in site search results.

3 Write the body

The Body field works like a word processor. Select text to make it bold or italic, or to add a link. The style menu gives you:

- Heading and Subheading for section titles.
- Quote for a pulled-out statement.
- Bulleted and numbered lists.

The + button inserts things that are not text: an Image (with its own alt text and caption), a Divider between sections, or a Table. In a table, the first row is the header row, and the first column is shown in bold automatically.

4 Publish

1. Press Publish, bottom right.
2. Wait about thirty seconds.
3. Open the article on the website and read it through. Reload with Ctrl + Shift + R if you do not see the change.

NEVER CHANGE THE SLUG OF A PUBLISHED ARTICLE

The slug is the article's address. Change it and every existing link breaks: anything shared on LinkedIn, cited in an email, or already indexed by Google leads to a "page not found". Get it right before the first publish and leave it alone afterwards. A clumsy slug on a live article is much less costly than a broken one.

Changing something that is already live

Fixing an article

Open it, make the change, press Publish. That is the whole procedure. Typos, dates, a better excerpt, an extra paragraph: all the same.

Swapping a photo

1. Click the current image.
2. Choose Replace and upload the new file.
3. Rewrite the alt text. It still describes the old picture, and nothing will warn you.
4. Publish.

Updating a market report

Choose Market report in the left-hand list. There are eight entries: four reports, each in English and German. Edit the one matching the language you want.

You can change the title, the summary, the "What's inside" bullet points, and the cover image. The report's web address and the logos shown further down the page are fixed in the site's code.

The imprint and privacy policy

Under Legal page, in English and German. These carry legal weight in Germany, so change them deliberately and check both languages say the same thing.

Your contact address or booking link

Under Site settings. Two fields: the email address shown on the contact page, and where the "Request a Meeting" button sends people. Change the booking link here if you ever move away from HubSpot.

Publishing in German

A German article is a separate document that is linked to its English original by having the same slug. Where a German version exists, German visitors see it. Where it does not, they see the English article with a short note explaining that the specialist articles are in English. That note disappears by itself once everything on the page is translated.

1 Duplicate the English article

Open it, then choose Duplicate from the menu beside the Publish button.

2 Set the language and check the slug

Change Language to German. Then check the slug is character for character identical to the English one.

3 Translate and publish

Translate the title, excerpt, body and image alt text. Leave the slug, date and category alone. Publish.

THE SLUG IS WHAT PAIRS THE TWO

If the German slug differs from the English one by even one character, you do not get a translation. You get a second, separate article, and German readers keep seeing the English one. If a translation does not appear on the site, this is almost always why.

If something looks wrong

The change is not on the website

1. Reload the page properly with Ctrl + Shift + R. Your browser often shows you the copy it already had.
2. Check the studio still shows Published rather than unpublished changes.
3. Give it a minute and try once more.

You published something by mistake

Correct it and publish again. It will be right within the minute. There is no need to take the page down first.

An article vanished from the blog

Check its Language field. An article set to German will not appear for English readers.

What is not in the studio

Menu labels, page headings, section titles, the wording on the home page, and everything about the design live in the site's code. That is deliberate: they are load-bearing, and a stray edit would break a page rather than change a sentence. If you want any of them changed, ask, and it is a small job.
